Essay 4 – Score: 3.5

Homework has been an integral part of American schools for hundreds of years. That being said, it is a negative impact positive in schools for a long time. Homework assigned to high school students has meaning and use. Though critics worry about the stress and interference of heavy homework assignments, high school students should have homework that assists toward their final grade. It improves the U.S. education ranking worldwide, it helps improve students' scores on standardized tests, and it keeps kids challenged and thinking at home.

In depth, having homework assist towards high school students' final grades improves the U.S. education ranking worldwide. According to Amy Gault, a member of Congress, "Making it less and less and less is contributing to us being less competitive world wide." Homework is simply something our American high schools need have to compete with other nations around the world. As the subject of homework, Kelly Wilcox, of CNN, stated that homework was "crucial to competing in a global economy." This goes to show that homework for high schoolers isn't just for the students. Although it is essential for students, homework is also a fantastic way to keep U.S. schools used as some of the best.

Moreover, Homework for high school students helps them to improve their scores on standardized tests. Homework brings up skills of high school students in a variety of subjects, which can help them to score higher averages on standardized tests. The U.S. Department of Education released statistics on the relationship between amount of homework and scores. The National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) showed that students in high school who completed more or more hours of homework scored around 11 to 20 points higher on standardized testing tests than the students who spent more assigned homework at all.

Finally, homework challenges high schoolers to keep thinking after they've left school. Homework, more so, is required, so even in high schoolers get home, everything they learned during the day would be easily forgotten. If they played video games and went on social media sites, high school students would ignore their brains, none of all the information they had soaked up during the day. As said from CNN, a father of two, says kids are "so distracted by their video games and social media that they're going downhill." This problem can be fixed by giving high schoolers homework for grades. Homework would give students a way to retain information they learned during the day and make them think and focus on actually learning the material given to them during class. According to Kelly Wilcox of CNN, some parents say their kids "aren't getting enough or any homework at all, and that they're bad to punish their sons to keep their kids challenged." Homework is essential to the final grade in high school, it would encourage students to think and learn all the time, even when they're not in school.

High school students need homework as part of their final grade, because it raises the U.S. standard of education on an international scale, it improves scores on standardized tests, and it helps students by keeping them challenged and thinking after school. Homework being essential to the final grade is a way to compete themselves high schools to score better over foreigns, and to ensure that our toppling U.S. students do their best to do.
